Since its inception, social work has been striving for the empowerment of people in need (PIN) so that they can participate in the problem-solving process and enhance their livelihoods. Although its contribution is indisputable, there are many barriers. In this seminar, a participatory inspiring model involving intermediary social work actors (ISWA) will be shared to help think of the decolonisation and the revitalisation of social work in order to respond adequately to the poverty phenomenon or other adversities among PLHIV or other disenfranchised categories of people in similar conditions.

Key-note speaker: Charles Kalinganire is a Social Work lecturer at University of Rwanda, Department of Social Sciences. His research interests include social work and community development, child and family welfare, and gender.
